The present invention relates to an electrical connector, and particularly to an electrical connector for connecting a pair of complementary ICs. Electrical connectors, such as card connectors and board-to-board connectors, are well known in the electronic industry. Such connectors are typically used for providing quick connect and disconnect capability between a pair of complementary devices. For example, they are commonly used for facilitating electrical connection between a daughter card in a computer and a pin grid array on a motherboard. A card connector has a housing and a plurality of contacts. The contacts have a contacting portion for contacting a card edge and a tail portion for retaining the contacts in the housing. When an insertable card edge contacts the contacting portion of the contacts, the contacts are inserted into a passageway in the housing so that their tails are exposed at the other end of the housing. Then, a plurality of contacts is inserted into a card connector from its tail end, thereby obtaining reliable connection between a card edge and contacts. Some card connectors have a receptacle portion and a shield. A panel of the receptacle portion is normally provided with an opening extending therethrough. When a card edge contacts the contacting portion of the contacts, the KEYMACRO is a handy tool that gives you the possibility to record any keystroke you type into a Windows Registry or launch a command directly from the keyboard. It can record the Windows-defined system hotkeys for operating system functions and the hotkeys associated with all the popular keyboard applications, so you can use them without lifting your hand from the keyboard. This application is used for saving or automating the execution of a variety of Windows-defined system hotkeys. This makes it possible to create your own "shortcuts" for performing frequently used tasks. KEYMACRO can be used as a regular keystroke recorder. It can also be used as a "scripting engine" so that you can create your own scripts or macros to perform specific tasks, e.g., a script that executes a browser that you often use for checking the news. You can set up the program to record all the hotkeys you need or just a specific set of them. You can also record your hotkeys for every application or every window separately. You can even configure it to record the hotkey while the mouse cursor is over a particular area of the desktop. You can execute your macros directly from the program without first pressing a hotkey, thus making the task being performed "automagically". The application can record hotkeys associated with any function of the operating system, including the Windows hotkeys that are associated with any of the following Windows functions: The desktop (windows with title bar and minimize, maximize, and close buttons), the taskbar, the start menu, the windows search tool, and the windows key. The web browser (all web browsers except Internet Explorer). Windows Explorer (standard windows file manager). The Windows Control Panel (including windows for Control Panel and Add/Remove Programs). Windows Phone Control Panel. Windows Firewall. Windows Firewall (this feature is not supported by the portable version). Windows Firewall (this feature is not supported by the portable version). Windows Explorer (with or without the default shortcuts, such as "Open/Save/Back"). Windows Internet Explorer. Windows Media Player.
